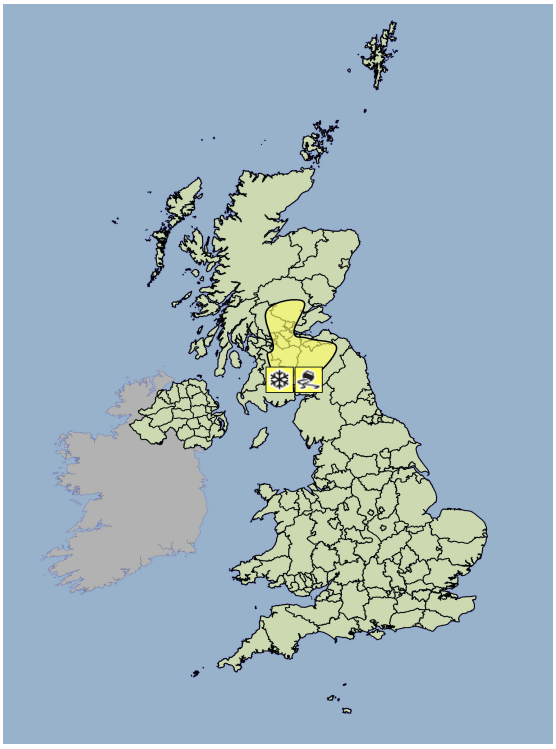
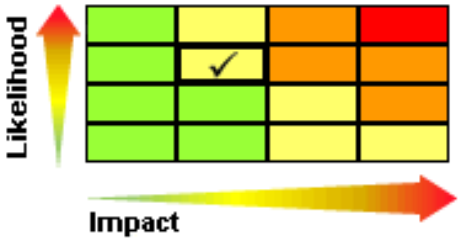
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
A deepening area of low pressure moving east across the Borders on Friday evening will bring a wet end to the day across much of southern and eastern Scotland. While most of the snowfall will be over the hills, heavier outbreaks could bring some sleet or wet snow to low levels. Indeed 2 cm or so of wet snow may accumulate on some roads down to 100 m with the risk of more than 10 cm on roads above 300 m. As skies clear from the west later this evening, these chilled roads will cool off further allowing icy stretches to form on roads which have not had sufficient time to be treated. There is a good deal of uncertainty on the extent of the snow and how low it will penetrate, so drivers are advised to keep in touch with local travel reports and allow for some extra journey time.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Snow and Ice

Valid from 18:00 on Thu, 03rd Dec 2015 until 23:55 on Thu, 03rd Dec 2015

An area of heavy rain, with some wet snow on higher ground giving several cm in places, will clear eastwards during Thursday evening. As temperatures fall sharply under clearing skies, widespread icy stretches will form on untreated surfaces, especially where any wet snow settles then freezes. Please be aware of difficult driving conditions and low level travel disruption.
